SPACE ENGINEERING

Certainly one of the most exciting possibilities in space exploration is that life may be found there. The most likely candidate is Mars. Where balloon observation is the infrared have detected emissions characteristic of the carbon-hydrogen bone. While this does not prove the existence of life on Mars it is most certainly highly provocative. For this reason, preparations are going forward with various types of instruments to search for living forms on the Red Planet. These will be carried in fly-bys and landers as soon as we are able to provide the necessary transportation.

All the data available at present would indicate that there is little likelihood of life on Venus. Various radioastronomical observations of the planet indicate that the surface temperatures are in the vicinity of 600 degrees F. Which is well over the boiling point of water. These temperatures are in themselves discouraging enough. But when taken in conjunction with the probably very high pressures existing on Venus—exceeding 20 atmospheres at the surface—it seems likely that the entire planetary surface is bathed in a searing atmosphere. And that there is no chance of life there.

The biologists insist, however, that there may yet be life on Venus. Existing in the cooler upper atmosphere. Balloon samplings are being made of the earth's upper atmosphere to search for organisms that might be living there. Results from these investigations may shed additional light on how much of a point the biologists have in connection with Venus. It does not appear likely that there are living forms on the moon. Because of the lack of an atmosphere, the lack of any observable water, and the extreme ranges to which the lunar surface is subjected. Some believe, however, that there might be living forms existing at some distance below the hostile lunar surface.

But even if there are no living forms on the moon, other biologists point out that the moon is still of interest in that it may carry living forms or possibly material that is in the nature of precursors to life. Controversy rages on this issue. With some of the scientists categorizing this reason on the part of the biologists as absolute nonsense. But the biologists can counter with the observation that if they should be right, walking all over the moon with dirty feet or plastering it with dirty material, can destroy a once-in-forever opportunity to make exobiological studies that may have great bearing on our understanding of terrestrial life.

At any rate it seems clear that we must be careful about what we do in the case of Mars. A suggestion was made that Mars be made an ecological preserve where steps are taken to protect the planet from undesirable contamination. According to the suggestion, Mars would be investigated in such a manner as to protect the interests and needs of the biologists who wish to search for and study any living forms or traces of life that might exist there. This proposal also included the suggestion that, although Venus and the Moon not be considered as ecological preserves, care be taken to minimize their contaminations.

Of course, if Mars is to be maintained as an ecological preserve, this can be done only by international cooperation. Specifically, at the present time between the U.S. and our closest rival in space programs. One might mention in passing, that those who are concerned about possible contamination of our neighbors in space through the introduction of terrestrial organisms also point to the danger of back contamination of earth by the introductions of extraterrestrial organisms. Careful thought must be given to this problem and in due time appropriate steps taken to remove any risks that are judged unacceptable.

All of the foregoing discussion concerned life already in space. It may well be that no such life does exist. But that does exist. But that does not end our interest in life in space. Because even though there may be no life in space or on the other planets, nevertheless in the course of our space program we are certainly going to put life out there. So that one very important aspect of life in space concerns the influence of the space environment and space flight environment on terrestrial organisms. In satellites and space probes there will be the opportunity to study the effects of weightlessness, radiation, new periodicities, and other conditions strange to terrestrial life. Man himself will be one of the major objects of study.

Our consideration of life in space had led very naturally to the subject of manned flights through space. One of the most fundamental changes being brought about in today's world is the gradual severing of the chains that have throughout all past history bound man to earth. Although one does not yet see how man may extend his presence to the other stars, at the present time it is no longer regarded as absurd or unreasonable to speculate that in the course of time, man's home in space will indeed cover the solar system. After that? Perhaps towards the other Galaxies.

This exciting prospect of flight through space will involve journeys from earth to moon or planet and exploration of the moon and planets. It will, in time, include operations over extended periods in orbiting laboratories and observatories. At first, these will be laboratories and observatories encircling the earth. But in the future some of them may well be placed in orbits about the moon or planets. In all of this new type of travel, the science of astronautics will develop space and come to assume the role that navigation has in earth travel.

Connecting this flight through space with ordinary earth travel will be high speed flight through the earth's atmosphere. Both on the way out and on reentry. Indeed all of this new activity may be expected to reflect back on earth travel in the form of new modes and higher speeds. Flight through space will also bring into being another new activity of man. Namely, engineering in space.

The phenomenon of engineering in space is still a thing of the future. At the present time space engineering is carried out on the ground. The engineered object, if it is a space vehicle or a spacecraft, is placed in orbit after the engineering has been accompiished. In this approach, man stays on the ground and sends his engineered object out, into space. Much has been accomplished by this approach. As in the form of scientific satellites and space probes, weather satellites, communications satellites, navigation satellites, and military applications of space technology and even manned satellites.

But one day, the engineer will go out into space to do part of his work there. Perhaps engineering is the wrong term. It may be that construction and maintenance would be more nearly the correct terms to use. However it seems reasonable to assume that the novelty of the problems to be faced will be such that the constructors and the maintainers will actually have to be engineers in the real sense of the word. One can foresee the need to assemble in space large laboratories and stations to serve as staging areas for interplanetary flight.

It may be necessary to form the reflecting surfaces for astronomical telescopes under the conditions of weightlessness in which they are to operate so as to eliminate distortions that would be introduced by forming them on the ground under $1g$ and then launching them into orbit. Considering the tremendous expense that one must anticipate for the construction of huge observatories and laboratories of the future it may well prove to be far cheaper to provide human maintenance and repair than to rebuild and launch a new satellite every time an old one has ceased to function.

Project Gemini is aimed at solving the problems of orbital rendezvous. Orbital rendezvous will not only contribute to early lunar landings but also make possible human maintenance, repair and assembly of structures in space. The time will come when man will do engineering on the moon. And in the more distant future on the planets. In both cases, his engineering will be done under conditions far different from those he encountered on earth. In the case of the moon, for example, the gravity will be only one-sixth of that met with on the earth. While the lack of an atmosphere, bombardment by meteoritic particles, the constant presence of the interplanetary radiations, the tremendous range of temperatures, the possible presence of dust that may be more than just of nuisance, unusual conditions of electrostatic charging, will confront him with problems. All of which will tax his ingenuity and skill to the utmost.

So it is reasonable even to say that some time in the next century we may find universities, schools of engineering, and other institutes all given courses under the heading of "Space Engineering."

AMAZING WRIST RADIO

Wow! A wrist radio like the one used by the famous detective character that really works. Yes, imagine receiving broadcasts up to about 50 miles, using the antenna attachment. Without attaching the antenna lead in clip (which is included), to a substantial antenna such as the dial stop on a telephone, reception is limited to a few miles. Think what fun it will be to have your own personal wrist radio that actually permits you to listen to your own programs without disturbing others, and there are no batteries, no tubes—nothing to wear out. Makes detective and battle games seem more real, pretending to transmit messages, and getting help in the nick of time. Complete with private earphone.

Albert Dorne—probably the greatest money-maker in the history of commercial art. At the height of his career, he began a full-time search for people who like to draw.

He's Looking for People Who Like to Draw

TODAY HUNDREDS of men and women who never thought they could be artists are working happily at easels and drawing boards, making pictures and getting well paid for it. They all can thank Albert Dorne, a famous artist who devotes almost his full time to helping other people become artists.

Some of the People Dorne Has Helped

Herb Smith was a payroll clerk. Soon after he started studying with us, he landed an art job with a large printing firm. This was four years ago; today he's head artist for the same firm.

John Busketta is another. He was a pipefitter's helper in a big gas company. Today he still works for the same company, but as an artist in the advertising department, with a big increase in pay.

Harriet Kuzniewski was bored with an "ordinary" job before she heard of Albert Dorne. Today she does high-style fashion illustration in New York.

John Whitaker of Memphis was an airline clerk two years ago. Recently he won a national cartooning contest and was signed to do a newspaper comic strip.

Long before Albert Dorne started looking for people who like to draw, they came to him for advice and help. Since he alone could help only a few of these people, he called together America's most successful artists—men like Norman Rockwell, Jon Whitcomb, Stevan Dohanos and Al Parker.

A Plan to Help Others

He said: "All over America, there are people who like to draw, who could be turned into good artists. Why can't we give these people the training they need—including all the trade secrets and know-how we've learned over the years? I'm suggesting a new kind of school—a home-study art school that would give talented people the best professional art training, no matter where they live."

The famous artists agreed. Taking time from their busy careers, they spent several years creating a remarkable series of art lessons covering every aspect of drawing and painting. They illustrated their lessons with over 5,000 "here's-how" illustrations. The lessons start from scratch and cover every skill a top artist needs. Finally, the famous artists developed a wonderful way to give each student personal correction and advice all through his training.

Albert Dorne is not surprised by the success of his students. "The art field is growing. We keep getting calls from all over the country, asking us for practical, well-trained students who can step into full-time or part-time art jobs."

Famous Artists Talent Test

To find others with art talent worth developing, the famous artists created a 12-page talent test. Thousands paid $1 for this test, but now the School offers it free and will grade it free. If you show talent on the test, you will be eligible for training by the School. No obligation. Simply mail coupon. It might be your first step to an exciting, well-paid career in art.

I would like to find out whether I have art talent worth developing. Please send me, without obligation, your Famous Artists Talent Test.
